As food scarcity grows, tourism may provide the demand and support required for food production and encourage tourism resorts to become more sustainable. However, tourism may also threaten food security and nature conservation. This Summer Course -organized by Dept. of Resource and Environmental Economics (ESL) Faculty of Economics and Management (FEM) IPB University— aims to 1) discuss the trade-offs and synergies among nature conservation, tourism and food security; 2) equip participants with basic knowledge on methods on valuing environmental resources; 3) challenge participants' critical thinking on the course theme through seven site visits covering mountain, city park, small islands and marine ecosystems.
